Studieren in Halle

This master's programme welcomes a growing international student community, fostering cultural diversity and an enriching academic environment. Students from around the world are fully integrated into an international context that values multiple perspectives and intercultural exchange.

A unique feature of this programme, in comparison to similar international degrees at other universities, is the explicit integration of linguistics alongside literary and cultural studies. All courses and academic activities are conducted in English and no knowledge of German is required for admission or during your studies. However, international students can take advantage of our comprehensive language support services to learn German if they wish. The programme encourages individual specialization. Students benefit from a diverse range of modules and research colloquia, where current theoretical developments and research projects in literature, linguistics, and cultural studies are discussed. In addition, language practice is an integral part of the curriculum, aiming to further develop English proficiency up to the C2 level.

Practical experience is a key element of this programme: an integrated internship bridges academic theory and practical application and prepares graduates for various careers, such as roles in museums, NGOs, educational organizations, and the broader cultural sector. There are no tuition fees (apart from the standard university registration contributions).

Close academic supervision and individual support ensure that each student receives guidance tailored to their academic interests and career aspirations.
